THIS VOLUME TO
MR. G. WILLARD HALES
IN APPRECIATION
OF HIS SUCCESS-
FUL AND EARNEST
SERVICE AS THE
PRESIDENT OF
OUR HIGH SCHOOL
BOARD . . .

THE PLAN

The board of the Houseboat on the Styx was convened in extraordinary session.

"Order, gentlemen!" the chairman, Dr. Johnson, was rapping for order. "We have a most important matter to discuss. There's going to be A Century of Progress Exposition in Chicago, and ——"

"Never heard of it!" came from Alexander, the Great.

"It's in America. Don't you remember that place I discovered?" smiled Columbus.

"You discovered? Say, I was living on that place a couple of hundred years before you ever thought of sailing a boat!" exclaimed Leif Eriksen.

"Gentlemen, gentlemen, please! This is important. Now it seems to me that we really should attend in a body. What is the opinion of the assembly upon this subject?"

"Friends, Romans, countrymen——"

"Sit down, Antony," interrupted Brutus.

"I think Dr. Johnson's idea is excellent," puffed Boswell. "I move that the Associated Shades attend the World's Fair, in Chicago, this summer."

"Second the motion!"

"Say, didn't that place burn down?" asked Nero.

"It has been moved and seconded that the Associated Shades attend the Fair, in Chicago, this June. Is there any discussion?"

"Yes!" said Sir Walter Raleigh, jumping to his feet, "Where would we stay? We must have some place to call home, if we give up the comforts of this clubhouse. I, for one, don't intend to forego the pleasures of the Houseboat just to float around the World's Fair. That is, not unless I can be comfortable while I am there."

"Quite right, Sir Walter. That subject will be dealt with directly after we dispose with the question before the house. All those in favor of the motion say, 'Aye'."

"Aye!" came in a chorus from the board.

"All those opposed say, 'No'."

Silence.

"Now then, concerning a place to stay. I overheard some people from Oak Park talking the other day and they were saying that their high school was worth visiting. That, in my opinion, would be an ideal place to use as our headquarters."

"But, Doctor, if we go, why not be a few weeks early and get acquainted with our new home?" suggested Bismarck.

The motion was speedily passed and the meeting adjourned in order to allow the members to prepare for the coming journey.

The next Monday, the Associated Shades took over the school as a base for their visits to the Fair grounds. Sir Walter assumed the position of desk clerk, using the main office as his headquarters. Few complaints were registered, and those quickly put to rights.

Our book being organized with Progress, Achievement, and Activity as the general theme, an artistic motif has been chosen exemplifying the development of Art through the ages from the crude wall paintings of the early Egyptian period to the striking trend toward ultra-modernism.

"Progress is the activity of today and the assurance of tomorrow," says Emerson. Our four years together have been filled with happy activity, and whatever our doubts and uncertainties about tomorrow, we know that it will be different and more to our liking and choosing because of our activities and accomplishments in high school.

The class of 1933 is outstanding in the work of the classroom and in all the numerous activities of the school. The officers of your class have been splendid leaders, and you have supported them with high ideals, progressive attitudes and steady enthusiasm.

I believe that more important to you seniors than Chicago's "Century of Progress" is this commencement time which celebrates in a personal way your own four years of activity and accomplishment. I congratulate you; and since I have learned to expect achievement from the class of 1933, I congratulate you on the assurance of tomorrow and wish you courage, stamina, and Godspeed on your journey.

M. R. McDaniel.

THE DINNER

The shades had assembled in the cafeteria. The event was glamorous; everyone popping with enthusiasm. Sir Walter Raleigh and Queen Elizabeth were acting as host and hostess to Socrates, Confucius, and Dr. Samuel Johnson. Epicurus, connoisseur and head waiter, served ambrosia in the Scholarship Cup. Dr. Johnson quaffed it at a single gulp.

"Gone, but not forgotten," Epicurus turned and walked out.

Confucius winked at Socrates, "O, boy! There's Cleopatra."

"Speaking of examinations," returned Socrates, "I looked at one of the final exams today. All I can say is that if anyone graduates from this school, he deserves to. I used to think up some pretty smart questions in my day, but these teachers get me down. We'll have to go to Commencement. I'd like to see who can take it. They have good speeches, too, I understand."

"Especially good ones this year," replied Confucius, putting on a long face to hide a smile. "I saw one being written that I know you'll enjoy immensely."

"Why?" bit Socrates, innocently.

"It was all your stuff, your pearls of wisdom from way back when."

"I bet if he did go, he wouldn't agree with himself," broke in Boswell's Johnson.

Queen Elizabeth looked bored and was busy admiring the effect of a small gold pin she had fastened to her gown.

"Isn't that something new?" asked Sir Walter. "Who gave you that?"

"I helped myself," replied the Queen coolly. "They were holding a nifty ceremony this morning. I really felt right at home. Some National Honor Society or something."

"Hm!" mused Socrates, pausing for effect, "I wonder if that's a society for national honors or——"

"Oh! Stop your eternal hair-splitting," begged Confucius, "and tell me what that TA T'APISTA you see all over the school means."

"Allow me," spoke up the Doctor, eager to exhibit his erudition. "It means the best. I think it is the school motto."

"If it's not, it ought to be," the Queen smiled.

Sir Walter excused himself and went to the middle of the room to make an announcement.

"I have made arrangements to make a trip to the Fair grounds tomorrow. We will meet in the attic tomorrow at ten. Aeolus will have three special clouds waiting for us and will provide a wind direct to the grounds. All who go, however, must have one of these tickets."

THE TRIP

On the morning of the third day in their new quarters, Sir Raleigh strolled nonchalantly down the front hall, puffing contentedly on his pipe. His pleasure was marred somewhat by the sudden appearance of Calvin, who frowningly and forcefully removed his pipe.

"What's the idea?" remonstrated the Elizabethan angrily.

"I'm sorry, Sir Walter, but I think inasmuch as we are using this building free of charge, we should conform to its rules. You've seen the Black List, haven't you? If you must smoke do it somewhere else."

"I wish he'd mind his own business," grumbled Raleigh, putting his pipe away and heading for the attic. As he entered, he was met by a veritable storm of questions and complaints.

"Listen, Sir Walter," began Conan Doyle, "how do we get some decent books around here? I haven't found a detective story in this building.

"Why not speak to the Student Council downstairs?" returned Raleigh. "You claim to know how, and they seem to get things done."

"See here, Sir Walter," cried Luther angrily, "if this was a joke, it was a pretty poor one. Look at this ticket you gave me. What has the Junior Prom got to do with the World's Fair?"

"I'm sorry, Martin. I pulled it out of the ticket chairman's pocket and never glanced at it."

"Did I hear Luther say something about a Prom?" asked Valentino, who was also about to pounce on Raleigh angrily. "Because some wiseacre slipped me a card to the May Breakfast."

"Well, then, let's exchange," said the reformer.

Sir Walter breathed a sigh of relief at his good luck and hurried to meet Queen Elizabeth, who looked cross.

"What's the matter?" he asked.

"Oh! I don't know, some girls' council I've been watching. They were planning something, and this girl objected. They actually sat there and let her talk. Can you imagine me even listening at any time to some upstart? You know what I'd do to her, don't you?"

"I think I do," replied Sir Walter, ruefully fingering his neck, and winking significantly at Mary, Queen of Scots, who was listening.

"When does this trip start?" fussed Elizabeth. "You know how I hate to be kept waiting, Walter."

"I think we are all set. Everybody who is going to the Fair today, please check up on your tickets."

BROOKS CLUB

Nero was charging joyously down the hall, not even caring if he went through the students thronging the halls.

"Hey, where you goin'?" yelled Constantine.

"There's a religious meeting down here and I'm on my way! Boy, what swell bonfires they'll make."

"You can't do that. People just don't get burned now until after they go for a ride with Charon."

"Well, maybe I'll just feed them to the lions then. That's a lot more fun anyway."

"What will you use for lions?"

"Oh, I could borrow them from the circus downtown."

And Nero continued on his way, his eyes blazing madly in joyous anticipation.

HI-Y

The shades of Paul Bunyan and Hercules were haunting the "Y" in search of the billiard room.

"Did I ever tell you about my black duck dinner?" asked the lumberman.

"Only about a dozen times this last week," replied the Greek, dryly.

At this point a mighty noise assailed their ears, a noise of lips smacking lustily, the crunch of mighty grinders, the crash of silverware on plates, and the luscious swish of soup.

"Can they be my boys?" yelled Bunyan rushing through the door. He soon reappeared, a shamed and woebegone look on his usually placid face.

"And I thought my boys could eat," was the only comment he could make.

COMMERCIAL CLUB

Andrew Carnegie flowed down the hall one day with a contented look on his face. He had experienced many prosperous days and now that he was dead he liked to reminisce upon them. He stepped into a room filled with "Commercialites" just in time to hear the treasurer extracting money from the members. This touched the great Carnegie so much that he tried to speak, but he suddenly realized he could not reach them. Ivar Krueger met him on his way out and with a sneer said, "I suppose you told them how to make money."

"No," replied the tycoon, "They told me how!"

STAMP CLUB

George Washington blinked and awoke from his afternoon siesta. A group of studious-looking people poured into the room. In a flash, portfolios were opened and thousands of variegated pages were brought to light. Inspection revealed that the color was due to an applique pattern of postage stamps. The General walked about looking at every specimen. His face grew white, then flushed in rage. He tore at his wig and dashed his cane against the floor. Finally he burst from the room, the essence of vanity outraged. At the end of the hall, he met his wife.

"I have been hurt, Martha. In a huge collection of stamps, millions, billions, trillions, not one, no, not one had my picture on it!"

ARTS AND CRAFTS

"We'd better tell the clerk where we're going so he'll know where to find us if we're wanted." So saying, Queen Elizabeth, Penelope and Betsy Ross hurried to the office and informed Sir Walter that they were going up to Room 325 to visit the Arts and Crafts Club.

"If I hadn't had so many state affairs to attend to I would have made just such a tapestry," remarked Her Majesty.

"I would have had time to finish mine," said Penelope, "if Ulysses hadn't come home just then."

"They're fortunate to have such supervision and materials," said Betsy Ross. "I once had to make a flag with only a few scraps."

Just then the phone rang. The president answered it, smiled, said, "All right," and hung up saying, "Some people must have their joke. The office wants Queen Elizabeth." Midst laughter, the three shades, understanding, departed as quietly as they had arrived.

GIRL SCOUTS

Through the whistling windows in Room 212 slipped Clara Barton; she slithered over to the mantel and there met Barbara Fritchie looking gloriously patriotic.

"What are you doing here with your old grey head?" asked Miss Barton.

"I came to watch the Girl Scouts do their daily good turn."

After hearing several imitations of crowds, pigs and one of Maurice Chevalier, Barbara remarked, "This is a pretty good circus they're putting on; don't you think so?"

Next came a recitation, "The boy stood on the burning deck," and then—imagine what!

"Shoot if you must this old grey head,

"But spare your country's flag, she said."

"That's enough!" said Barbara Fritchie, "I'm leaving."

"Hurrah!" shouted Miss Barton, "They've done their good deed for today."

SPORTSMEN'S CLUB

Samson was trying his utmost to push the sides of the auditorium doors when the Sportsmen dashed through his shade on their way to the lunch room. At the last of the group marched Hercules, who had been a visitor at the meeting. He stopped by Samson and said, "My good man, you can't break those down. You had a haircut only yesterday."

Nevertheless Samson strained harder than ever. Hercules watched the futile effort a while in silence. At last he could stand it no longer. "I'll bet it was his own jawbone which he used to kill those Philistines."

STAGE AND LIGHTS CREW

"Say, what's all that racket back stage?" queried Shakespeare, who had just been investigating the structure and acoustics of the auditorium, of Aristotle who was tinkering with the curtain.

"Oh, that's just Hercules trying to move flats. He gets them out in the middle of the stage, and he can't balance them, so down they come. I think he's wrecked two sets already, but just give him time."

"Yes, that's what they were telling me. They say that he ruined that outdoor scene so badly that it won't stand up, but Atlas volunteered to support the sky, and because he had had some experience along that line, they gave him the job."

THE CONCERT

The he-men from Hades had taken to sleeping in the halls during class periods. They were not disturbed by the constant twitter of students nor the rising, rasping voices of the teachers. A large group of shades were curled up on top of the lockers in one of the lower halls. Morpheus had just handed out his sleeping-pills, when an ear-splitting, nerve-shattering, shudder-provoking, timber-shivering blast threw them from their perches onto the floor. Thor was immediately on his feet.

"I bet those kids of mine have been playing with the box of thunder I left on the stove! By Jove, there's nothing they're not into!"

Horatio grabbed his armour and led the group toward the base of the disturbance. They entered a large room, one end of which was filled with people wearing or holding queer looking implements. They all seemed to be gathered around one individual who was waving something at them.

"I wonder what that is he's got in his hand," said Horatio. "Judging from the noise they make it must hurt something terrible."

Barnum and Bailey, who were following closely behind, grabbed each other and danced around in mad joy.

"A band, the school band! Boy, remember the one we had in our first circus?"

The "strain" proves too much for the others, and they hurry upstairs, leaving the two circus men standing in rapture beside the tuba.

"Listen!" exclaimed Wagner, "Is there another one in here?"

"Sounds sweeter to me," answered Bach.

Upon entering the Assembly Hall they found an almost identical condition, but to them the results were more pleasing, and they were attentively appreciative.

But the others scattered and ran from room to room trying to escape the noise. Phidias hid in one of the Art Classes and spent his time pushing pens and pencils the wrong way.

Nero took advantage of his sharp sense of smell and followed his nose into the Household Arts department, purloining the best eats he could find. One of the girls put some dough in the oven and forgot it. Nero could have helped, but he remained true to form and just fiddled around while the cake burned.

Down in the Manual Training department, Robinson Crusoe and Pandora sought relief from music in the drone of a buzz saw.

"Just look at all these tools," marveled Robinson. "You can bet I'd have built myself a palace if I'd had these on the island."

"Oh, see the pretty box?" Pandora reached to open it, but Crusoe slapped her hand away.

"Say, what are you trying to do, kill us? That's the switch box."

MUSIC CLUB

As Gilbert and Sullivan were walking down the corridor last Tuesday they happened to step into the Music hall. There they heard a string quintet playing some of Bach's selections to a large audience. On one side of the stage sat old John Sebastian Bach himself, smiling and keeping time to the music with his head. Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan locked their arms and proceeded to do a bit of routine dancing down the aisle.

"Johnny, your music is like a piece of tissue paper," they sang in unison.

"How you mean, like tissue paper?"

"It's tearable," was their reply.

DANCE ORCHESTRA

A faint trace of smoke assailed Nero's nostrils as he floated majestically down the hall. The smoke came from the music hall where the school dance orchestra was finishing a fast number. Nero passed through the door with his fiddle under one arm and his toga caught up under the other. He said, "My friends, could you lend me some of your heat?"

"Why certainly, just listen to this next piece."

"Please make it a hot one because I've been looking for something to start a good fire with, and I'm slightly out of practice on the violin. Sound your 'A'!"

GIRLS' CAMERA CLUB

Valentino and Eastman heaved a sigh of relief as the camera in which they had been jolting along was placed on the table.

Eastman said, "I've ridden in many conveyances in my day, but never in one of my own products."

"Well, I've certainly ridden in better vehicles," remarked the "Sheik."

Peeking through the lens, Eastman observed, "Pretty fine pictures for amateurs to have taken, don't you think?"

"They have the skill that would make them good cameramen in Hollywood," said Rudy, continuing his train of thought.

"And I bet they all use Eastman cameras," remarked Eastman, ignoring Valentino's last remark.

"Judging by the way the president runs that meeting, I see the makings of a fine director," mused Valentino.

BOYS' CAMERA CLUB

Daguerre and Eastman, who were in a jovial mood, found the boys in the Camera Club about to photograph themselves for the sixteenth time this season.

"You stand over there, and turn your back, and I'll stay here," grinned Eastman.

Hooper and Watson an hour later stood looking at the finished negative.

"Listen, you guys," said Bill angrily, turning to a group standing around the printer, "How many times do I have to tell you to keep out of my drawer? That's the tenth double exposure this year. You needn't laugh either," he cried, as a faint sound of amusement floated in through the transom.

AVIATION CLUB

An aeronautic exhibition, sponsored by the Aviation Club, had drawn a crowd to the stadium. Unbeknownst to them, the silent shade of Woodrow Wilson sat in their midst. He alone saw the shade of the Akron, down from which floated two shades, Count Zeppelin and Wilbur Wright.

Suddenly all eyes were strained toward a corner of the field where a monoplane, out of the pilot's control, was performing dangerous antics.

"You see," exulted Count Zeppelin, "the only safe type is the one I invented. Winged planes—bah!"

"Izzat so?" snorted Mr. Wright. "Just repeat that!"

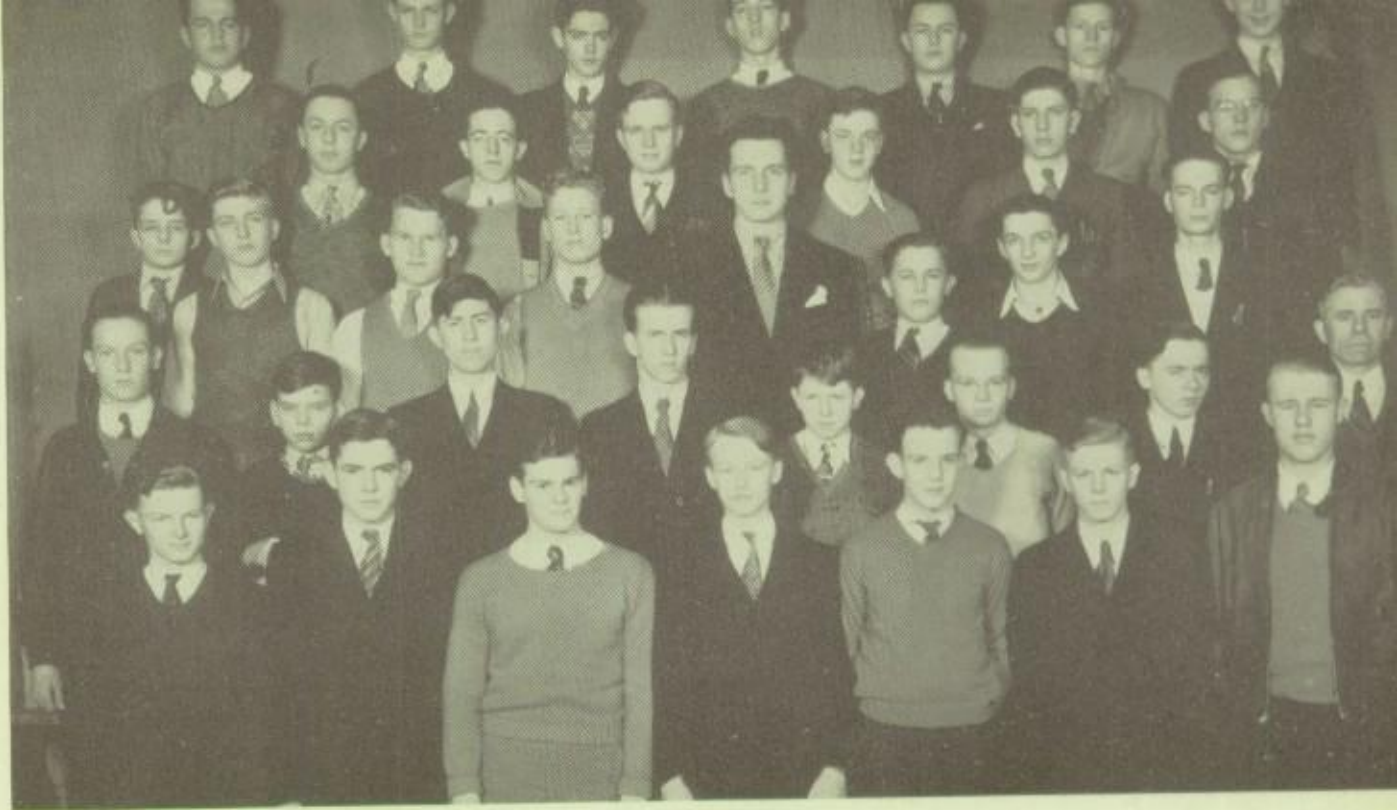

"Gentlemen," interposed President Wilson, "be calm. Let's settle this in a civilized way."

RADIO CLUB

Benjamin Franklin's shade soared into a Radio Club meeting one Tuesday, and there to his delight he heard a spirited technical discussion. After he had taken off his three-cornered hat and made himself comfortable, he listened interestedly to the lads. He reflected on the olden days of his kite and key, and how that jolt from the lightning stayed with him to his dying day. As Franklin was walking out of the room he met his old friend, Hamilton.

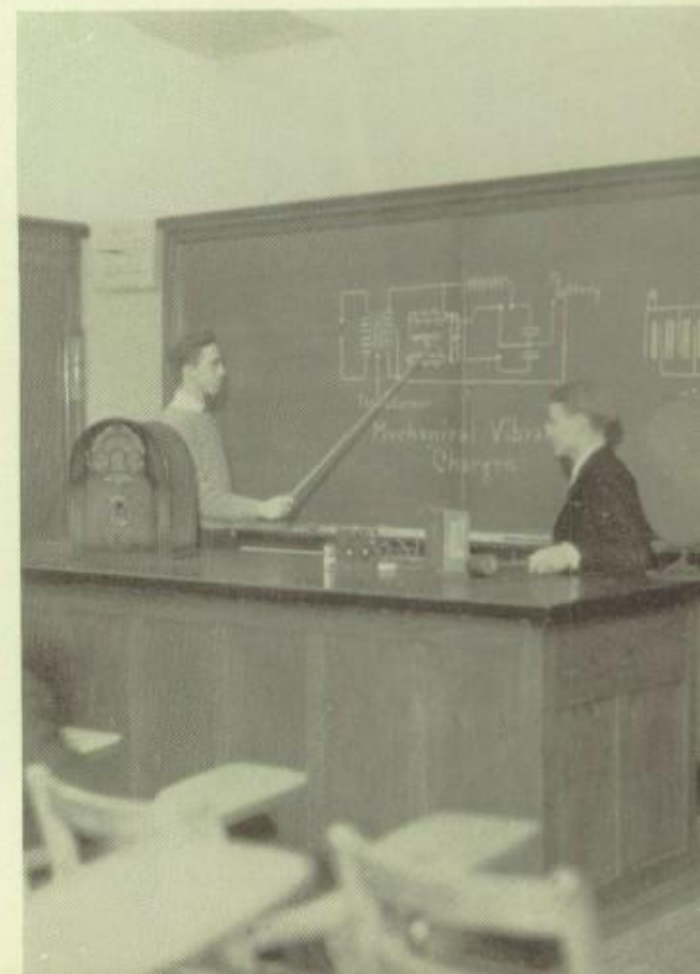

"Ben," cried the latter, "what are you so happy about?"

"It's marvelous, just marvelous, Alexander. Step in there and see what I started," exulted Ben as he sauntered off to read his copy of the Saturday Evening Post.

THE ARTISTS

The artists are a group of students who have contributed their drawings to be published in either the Literary Tabula or this annual. This year students in the Art classes drew the pencil sketches of the building which make up an unusual view section. Also during the year, these, and other students, are kept busy preparing the posters for all occasions.

THE STUNT

Hamlet had called in a number of his cronies and special friends. The event was a comparatively secret one, as he explained to them.

"Now my idea is to give a play of some sort for the shades. I think it would be splendid to get them all together again and have a real party. Since coming here, we've done pretty much as we pleased. It's about time we did something as a group, and there's nothing like a good show to arouse people."

"What show have you seen, Hamlet? We ought to copy a good one," was Aeschylus' comment.

"The best shows I've seen this year were staged right here in this school. I've been here before, you know," replied Hamlet.

"What were they like?" inquired Bacon. Then he winked at Shakespeare. "Even I might try writing a play," he chuckled.

Overlooking the pointed remark, Hamlet continued.

"There was a morality play, 'Everyman,' produced by Drama Club. It was quite a spectacle; had beautiful lighting effects, and showed expert showmanship. The whole thing was enriched by allegories and hidden truths. You'd have enjoyed it, Luther.

"Girls' Club show was 'The Amazons,' an uproarious comedy. A woman, who had always wanted sons, had three gorgeous daughters; but she fooled fate and brought them up as boys. What a time! Of course, three young men messed up the plan, and the complications were as clever as a jig-saw puzzle.

"There was a third triumph, a riot of color, a pageant of dignity, honor, courage, and love. Splendid, rapid action, piercing wit, and brilliant repartee. It was the story of your life, Cyrano."

"You flatter me," smiled the famous swordsman, fixing the lace at his cuff, "but why not have something light, a vaudeville skit, perhaps?"

"Burke Club has an average of one a meeting and Lincoln Club incorporates hotcha music into every program. I've seen quite a number of very amusing tidbits at both clubs."

"Just a minute," Mark Anthony interrupted Hamlet at this point, "I've got a heavy date with Cleo in a little while; and, anyway, we're supposed to be on a vacation, not a theatre circuit. I suggest we invite all the shades to the next free play that Drama Club or Masqueraders puts on. They seem to have made successes of the others; and then, too, we wouldn't have to waste time in rehearsals."

All present shouted boisterous approval. Nothing that Hamlet said could change their plans.

DRAMA CLUB

The shade of Hamlet paced up and down the basement corridors. Terrific bangs followed in his wake as the hustling mortals struggled with their lockers. Finally the last bang echoed and re-echoed. Hamlet clapped his hands to his ears. "Drama! Drama! Oh, how I thirst for drama. The doom of boredom settles down upon me."

Just at this moment Shylock rounded the corner of the hall. Keeping both hands over his voluminous pockets, he got in step with Hamlet and the two Shakespeareans paced up and down together.

"Shylock, the old question has come up again, 'to be or not to be.'"

"To be or not to be what?"

"To be or not to be bored. I've been to every show in town and it is certainly dead around here."

DRAMA CLUB

For no good reason except to keep in practice, the two actors opened the Music Hall doors and settled in the rear. A large group of seemingly interested students were noted listening to a demonstration of acting ability.

The program was varied and apparently amusing if the antics of the students could be accepted as proof. It ended with an interpretation of "Pagliacci" in the middle of which the shades eyed each other and simultaneously arose and made their exit. Hamlet as he glided through the doors was heard by Macbeth muttering a line from his immortal tragedy.

"Let the doors be shut upon him, that he may play the fool nowhere but in his own house. Farewell!"

MASQUERADERS

Sophocles and Lady Macbeth were strolling through the halls one fine spring afternoon, discussing the meaning of real tragedy. A smattering of applause was heard in the distance. The two shades, being curious, followed the sound. It led them to the Music Hall where practice was being held for the Masqueraders' play.

One character was on the stage, apparently just the least little bit frightened. Just as Sophocles and the Lady settled themselves in the laps of two eager-faced girls, the actor on the stage came to grief. Something happened to his voice; it squeaked, and a surprised look appeared on his face. Then the voice stopped altogether. Another voice hissed from the side of the stage and, with a gulp, the actor proceeded with his lines.

"Who is that harrassed lady down there?" asked the Greek dramatist.

"That's the faculty director, poor soul. No wonder she is frantic. Masqueraders gives its first public performance tomorrow."

"Oh! that's why everyone looks so important," said Sophocles slyly.

"Oh! no indeed, they are always that way. They're Sophomores, you know."

GAVEL

By the slushy process of osmosis, Demosthenes, up for air after frying for over 2,000 years, exuded through the door of 233 and slithered over to a window-sill, where he sat down. Much to his surprise, he found out that he was almost sitting on Mark Anthony.

"I say, Mark," said Demosthenes, "do you know what this Gavel whatsis is, or what kind of a which it would be if it were anything?"

"Well," answered Mark, "Webster says it's something to rap with, and they certainly do plenty of rapping around here. You should have heard the impromptu that the last girl just made."

FORUM

Anthony and Demosthenes slid through the keyhole in room 230 and stood in the back of the room.

"Speaking certainly has improved since my day," said Anthony. "Just imagine what I could do down in that Travel and Transport building at this World's Fair, where your voice echoes and re-echoes."

"Yes, indeed," replied Demosthenes. "The marvels of this age have set me thinking."

"My," said Anthony, "isn't it wonderful what they can do?"

"Many of these modern orators say they owe their success to the elocution courses they took as children," said Demosthenes, ignoring the slam, "but for me, give me the old mouthful of pebbles."

BURKE CLUB

"Well, goodnight, boys, I think I'll turn in early." Burke turned and ascended the stairs to his room 212; and found, to his surprise, he had company. A large group of young fellows were listening attentively to someone who was evidently in debate. Over in the corner, Abe Lincoln was laughing himself sick.

"What are you and these people doing in my room?" demanded Burke.

"Why this is your club, Ed. Burke Club to be exact."

Ed swept his gaze over them.

"Nice people, intelligent crowd," he said complacently.

"Yeah? and the subject of their debate is, Resolved: That the members of Burke should abandon careers and devote themselves to married life. Let's get out of here."

LINCOLN CLUB

They retired from 212 and hurried to Abe's room where they were greeted by a similar sight, worse if anything. Ed picked up a program and upon reading the words, "Lincoln Club," looked around for something to criticize. Finding this impossible, he showed the program to Abe, who promptly swelled with pride; but quickly regained his modesty.

"I hope these youngsters realize and respect the ideals I stood for," he said gravely.

"They certainly must," consoled Ed, "just listen to the jokes that tow-head is pulling."

"Don't pass judgment until you've heard an oration. This next lad looks promising."

At the end of the speech, Mr. Lincoln glanced at Burke, blushed crimson, and hung his head.

THE JOURNAL

"It's a good thing Hamlet didn't get us all started in a play," offered Poe. "Rehearsals are fun, I admit; but they mean work."

"He was right, though," answered Gutenberg, "we aren't doing anything together; we're not united."

"No, there ought to be something for us all to do; something we'd take an interest in." Amy Lowell teased herself a moment with a large piece of chocolate candy; and then, unable to resist her own temptation, chewed it ecstatically.

Samuel Pepys lifted his head from his papers, "Why not encourage the keeping of diaries; anybody can do it. Or, say—let's publish a journal. We can record all the events that happen here and sell the papers for the insignificant sum of—"

"Before you set the price," interrupted Poe, "where will we get some money to start this thing?"

Pepys thought a minute and then, "Maybe we could juggle some figures when the Tabula Publishing Board is working on its books."

"You're optimistic; it would take a financial wizard to make lunch money on what they overlook," scoffed Amy, "but we might get Queen Isabella to pawn her jewels again."

"Let's put that end of it into the hands of Sir Isaac Newton. He ought to be able to work it out successfully," decided Pepys. "What I'm worried about now is our style of writing; we are hardly modern. I suggest we brush up a bit on idioms and all that before we start."

At his request a large number of copies of the Trapeze, Literary Tabula, and Senior Annual were brought in, and the shades devoted themselves to an analytical study of these publications.

"This is what we want to copy!" exclaimed Poe holding up the Trapeze.

"Your taste is deplorable," remarked Amy. "What we want is something more subtle, more gentle, more daintily expressive; like this Literary Tabula, for instance."

Gutenberg had an eye toward his contract for the printing job and swore by everything holy that the only journal that could ever make a lasting impression would be one styled after the Senior Annual.

Just then Shakespeare rushed into the room waving a sheaf of papers in both hands.

"I have here the answer to all our prayers," he cried. "Here are the manuscripts of Story Club and Scribblers for the last five years. We'll learn plenty about modern slang from these."

These matters settled, the shades retired to the lunch room for tea, only to find there a veritable Babel, as German, French, and Spanish clubs engaged in their after-meeting refreshments.

STORY CLUB

Amy Lowell spirited aimlessly along the Sophomore corridor and having successfully eluded the ever-reforming Luther, flipped the ash with practiced nonchalance from a long black cigar.

It was not until she swept heavily into Room 331, where a steady drone of young voices had commanded her attention, that she beheld Samuel Johnson, his great bulk hunched unobtrusively in a secluded corner.

"Sammy!" she cried joyously, approaching with outstretched hand. "What brings you here?"

"This, I gather," he explained, after returning her greeting, "is the joint meeting of Story-Scribblers. I wish Boswell might be here to see it—really, Amy, it's a revelation! Take that young man over there for example. He has just finished reading his story, 'Adam Was a Plowman.' A splendid piece of work."

SCRIBBLERS

"HMMMMMMMMM," mused Amy, blowing a smoke-ring ceilingward. "Are there any poets in the group?"

"Yes, indeed," Johnson replied quickly. "That little lady over there just read a beautiful poem entitled 'The Cathedral.' I tell you, Amy, these youngsters are talented—every last one of them."

Amy puffed languidly on the black cigar.

"Isn't it delightful," she sighed meditatively. "They seem to be having such a good time. Just look, Sammy, at that anticipatory expression on all their faces now as they discuss refreshments."

"Re-refreshments?" echoed Johnson with a guilty glance at the twenty empty tea-cups on the table beside him.

LATIN CLUB

Caesar's ghost marched his legion of shades along the hall and suddenly came to a halt outside the door of room 210. Within, the select of our freshman draft gloated over their knowledge of that famous old drinking song, "Hic, Haec, Hoc," and conversed in halting—very halting Latin.

"Open, open the door in the name of Caesar!" shouted the mighty ghost, suspecting something shady. "No one can fool me with those stammering infants. Rout out the spies!"

Without waiting for an answer, an answer which never could come, the shade of Julius ordered a charge. On it swept with old-time spirit.

LATIN CLUB

Excitedly Caesar cried, "They move not! Call in the reserves. Surround the villains."

Their efforts were withstood with commendable indifference. Not a soul stirred from his seat, and the orator droned on.

"Lo! they retreat," cried the great general. "They flee as if by command of Jupiter himself."

The pursuing shades were scarcely able to keep the supposedly retreating freshmen in view, so swift was their flight. At last the latter reached their forte, the lunchroom. And there Caesar, much chagrined, found them attacking . . . ice cream sundaes.

FRENCH CLUB

"Say, I hear they have a French club around here," remarked Charlemagne to his companion, Napoleon.

"Yeah, let's look it up, Charlie. Maybe we could give them a few pointers," answered Napoleon.

"Maybe this is it," said Charlemagne as he put his ear to the keyhole of 316. "Yes, it sounds strangely familiar. I'm kind of rusty on my French though, what with talking English and Latin down there on the Styx for eleven hundred years. You've only been down there about a hundred years, so you ought to know. The only thing I can get is 'hors de combat'. What's that mean?"

"Oh, that's a war horse. I wonder what they're talking about."

"Probably Waterloo."

"Oh, forget it!" growled Napoleon as he turned away in disgust.

GERMAN CLUB

Having discovered that German Club was holding a meeting, Goethe and Schiller decided to attend, each in the fond hope of hearing some of his own poetry read.

"Ah, that must be they," exclaimed Goethe, as sweet musical sounds were wafted down the hall.

"I don't seem to recognize the tune," said Schiller dubiously. "It doesn't sound like one of my songs, nor one of yours, either."

As they approached the door, they noticed a quartet consisting of Bach, Beethoven, Wagner and Brahms swaying crazily from side to side in syncopated rhythm, bliss written on their countenances.

Astounded at this exhibition, the two poets looked in to see Ziervogel gaily crooning "Auf Wiedersehn, My Dear" to his own thumping accompaniment on the piano.

SPANISH CLUB

Spanish Club was dramatizing Don Quixote's encounter with the windmill when that worthy eccentric himself, accompanied by his fair and buxom lady, Dulcinea, happened by.

Passing through the door together, they experienced some degree of difficulty due to the expansiveness of Dulcinea.

"Caramba! (goodness) You are clumsy," cried the lady in her foghorn voice. "Where is your antique chivalry?"

"Oh, that!" answered the Don naively, "I traded it in for a new Ford."

Unnoticed, the two took seats in the back of the room. The dramatization reached its climax, picturing poor Don knocked off his horse. At the laughter that followed, the knight blushed.

"You were a clown, weren't you, Don?" roared his companion.

A POTPOURRI

THE EXPERIMENT

"Gentlemen!" Socrates rushed into the room, his face lighted with enthusiasm. "After two years of constant study I'm ready to disprove Einstein's most famous theory."

King Henry VIII looked up. "Speaking of relativity, I can tell plenty about families, myself."

Socrates glowered at the monarch; such levity was quite uncalled for. He appealed to the rest of the company for attention.

"I have condensed all my data into one basic, fundamental principle, which I shall now present to you in the form of a simple question: If my father owns a grocery store, and has three customers, all of whom have three wives—"

"Oh, no!" interrupted Henry, "I like the one about: Although an ill wind keeps a grindstone from gathering moss, a stitch in time—"

For this second interruption Henry received a crushing blow on the head. Socrates had lost patience and philosophy both and had dealt the King a mean crack with a handy piece of statuary. When Pasteur saw that the Great Husband lay unconscious with his pate asunder, he immediately took command of the situation.

"To the laboratories!" he shouted. "Quick, take him to the laboratories!"

Two huskies hustled the injured ruler to a table in the physics room, which promptly filled with curious persons intent on being of service. By using a waste-paper basket as a splint, and by an ingenious application of all the levers and pulleys known to science, Archimedes managed to force the two halves of the skull in place. Noticing that the head was still bleeding, Baron Munchausen made ready to put a tourniquet on the King's throat, but, fortunately, he was stopped by Sir Humphrey Davy. He, with the aid of Roger Bacon, the alchemist, had brought dozens of bottles from the chemistry laboratories. They took turns, and doused the patient with nitric, sulphuric, and hydrochloric acids. Then they soaked him in kerosene and black gunpowder. A match produced the required effect; and when he was done to a turn, they extinguished the flames.

At this point the King arose. "Enough of this horse-play. I'm just as immortal as the rest of you. But say, that last part felt good; I haven't been really warm since we left Hades. The rest of you ought to try it as a cure for homesickness."

The remainder of the day was spent in gathering combustibles from the various rooms in order to make the place more natural. Everyone had the time of his life except Poe, who opened the closet door in Room 15 and found, much to his disgust and embarrassment, his own mortal remains staring him in the face.

CHEMISTRY CLUB

It was Tuesday evening. Roger Bacon and Balilius Valentinus, the great alchemists, were strolling down the basement corridor. "Ah," sighed Bacon. "Last night I dreamed that I had found my lost formula for making gold."

"'Twas a great blow to humanity," declared Valentinus, "the day you lost that precious paper."

Suddenly they noticed various disagreeable sounds, mingled with the odor of burning rubber, issuing from Room 16. "Chemistry Club must be in session," cried Valentinus. "Let's ooze in."

"Now you've cooked it too much," came a voice from within.

"Well, this job of making synthetic rubber isn't all that it's cooked up to be," was the reply.

"I've been watching modern chemists," remarked Bacon, "and they're not so hot. Why, they can't make gold yet, even after all these centuries."

"Aha, but my dear fellow," replied his friend, "they can at least make rubber!"

GEOGRAPHY CLUB

As Columbus, Marco Polo, and Hendrik Hudson slithered out of the keyhole of Room 15, Hudson remarked, "That wasn't a bad meeting they had there."

"No, not bad at all," returned Marco Polo. "It reminded me of the days when I was doing my exploring. I don't want to seem to brag, but on that trip of mine when I visited China—"

"Yes, but after all what's China compared to America?" interrupted Columbus.

"Say, that was just pure luck on your part," said Hudson. "You know you were looking for India. In fact, you didn't even know you had found a new continent. As far as that goes, I've got it figured out that I'd have found the route to India myself if Fate had given me just a little more time."

"That shows how little you have kept up on your Geography," snorted Marco Polo. "If you'd only look at some atlas, you'd see you were all wrong."

SCIENCE CLUB

Down in Room 15 everything was in readiness. Mr. Park had spent hours setting up several spectacular and interesting experiments for the last meeting of Science Club. The shades of Galileo and James Watt, exploring the basement, silently passed through the crack under the door.

"There's one of my favorite experiments, the air thermometer. What a beautiful setup," began Galileo. "You see, James, even the heat of the hand causes the column to fall. Watch!"

"But why doesn't it rise? Certainly the hand is warmer than the air and raises the temperature of the bulb," exclaimed Watt.

Just then Mr. Park came in with his freshman charges. The shades stayed right on. The business was dispensed with, and the program started.

"Now," said the speaker, "we shall pass the steam into the air. It's rather warm air, at that. Will somebody open a window?" So saying, he directed the jet of steam right at the shade of James Watt.

"The fresh young upstart," muttered Watt, "Call me a lot of hot air, will he?"

Wrapt in technical discussion Luther Burbank and John Burroughs did not notice that the members of Zoology Club had left them in preference to the lunch room. They were trying to create a new hybrid. "Have what?" said Thoreau who had just come in.

NEWTON CLUB

Sir Isaac Newton was disproving his law of gravity by walking upside down on the ceiling. Below him he saw a group of hard working students attempting to make two planes meet in a straight line.

A rattling sound came to Sir Newton, and a high-pitched voice piped, "Oh, Sir Isaac, can you find him by geometry?"

Disturbed from his scientific reverie, the venerable shade turned, saw a head floating near him and asked, "Find whom?"

"Why, my long-lost brother," replied the head.

He mused a moment in silence, wondering why Gracie Allen's head should be conversing with shades.

"Eureka!" he exclaimed, "She's dead from the neck up!"

Say, This Line's on the Square.

THE CONTEST

Shakespeare strolled up to Bacon casually.

"Say, Bacon, have you heard the latest? Everyone is saying that I wrote your essays."

This was too much for Bacon, who whipped out his sword and demanded immediate satisfaction.

"Just a minute, boys," interrupted Caesar. "This is too good to waste. Why don't you choose sides and fight a sports battle? I'll be judge of the contest, and the winner will forever be recognized as the real writer. What do you say?"

The two agreed and spent that day picking their men, preparing for the great conflict. Early in the morning both sides issued forth, and drew up in lines within the field house, where they were instructed as to the day's encounters.

Baron Munchausen, a Shakespeare man, appeared on the tennis courts with a fly swatter in place of a racquet. By his antics he so convulsed his opponents that they were unable to play, and the match was easily won.

In track, since the score was tied, the high-jump was to be decisive. Shakespeare thought he had it in the bag when Tarzan jumped to the rafters, but Bacon played his trump card by entering Mercury, who literally flew through the skylight.

Aladdin succeeded in effecting a complete victory in baseball for Bacon. Summoning an invisible Genie, Aladdin would hand the ball to his powerful servant, who could hurl it with the speed of a bullet. Not only were the batters unable to strike the ball, but the wind from its passing usually swept them off their feet. This same combination also did wonders on the basketball floor. The Genie sat over the basket and directed into the hoop all shots that came within three feet of the board.

Hamlet, a Shakespearean star, was the outstanding soccer player, but he insisted upon using Yorick's skull in place of the ball. "Alas, poor Yorick," were his words every time he kicked one of his spectacular goals.

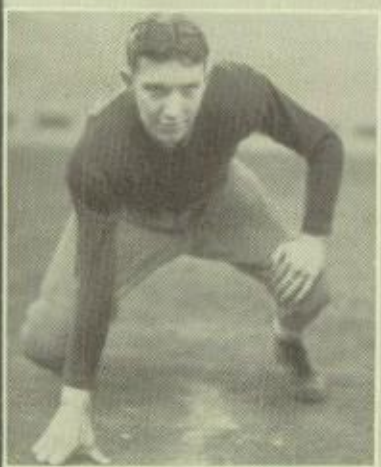

Leander, a man from Hell's Pond, did all of Shakespeare's swimming, winning easily over Father Neptune, who became confused and stopped to count the tiles on the bottom of the pool.

At last came the major contest of the day, football. Both teams having won three events, this was to decide the authorship. Goliath, a staunch Baconian, routed the Shakespearean line, incapacitating four men at every plunge. Presently a little fellow by the name of David stepped up.

"I know how to fix that guy," he smiled.

After the stone had been hurled, the Shakespeareans romped to easy victory.

That evening all the Shades rejoiced: "Well, that's finally settled—Shakespeare wrote Bacon!"

MONOGRAM CLUB

As Achilles and Hercules, drawn together by mutual athletic interests, were leaving a meeting of Monogram, the latter said:

"Dandy football material for some college."

"Why only football?" returned Achilles. "There are plenty of other good sports. But then, I never played football. I'd like to learn though."

"I'll teach you," cried Hercules expanding his chest. "You take this ball and try to get past me to the top of the stairway. I'll try to stop you."

Achilles advanced with more speed than caution, and was neatly and effectively tackled. So great was his impetus, however, that he went banging down the stairs.

"How do you think you'll like it?" inquired Hercules, with a grin, when the would-be football player came to.

"No thanks," declared Achilles, "I think I'll stick to the Trojan War."

GYM EXHIBITS

"I say now," began Sir Philip Sidney to Queen Elizabeth as they stood looking down on the Gym Exhibition being held in the Field House, "that is something like it. I think this is splendid, engenders good form, and all that sort of thing, you know."

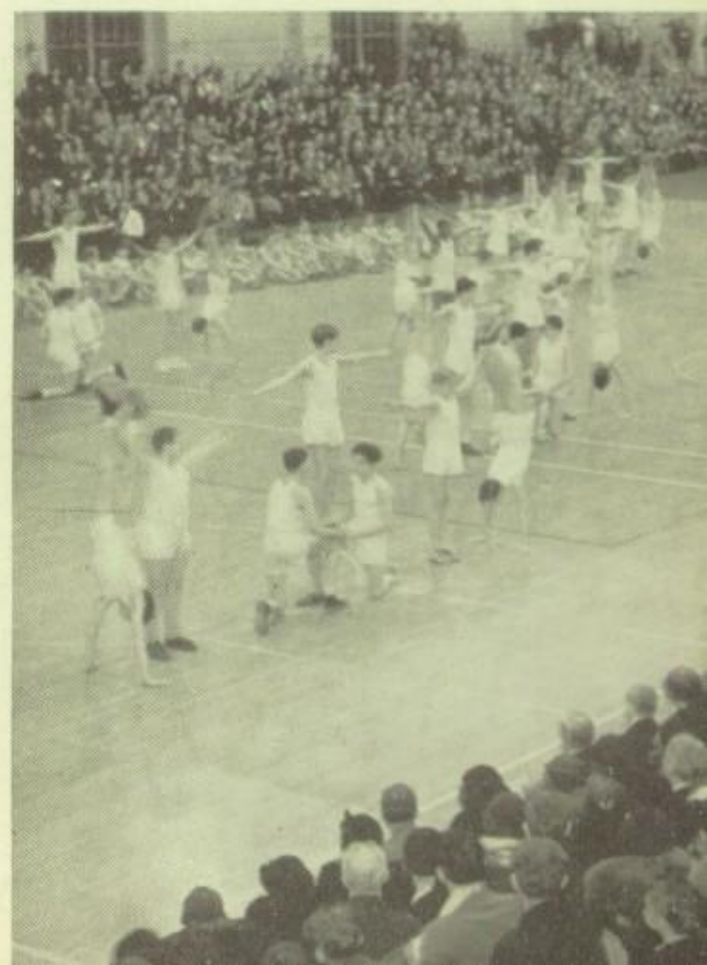

"Well," said his monarch, thinking ruefully of her stiff brocades, "if I had had a chance to dress like those young ladies, I think maybe I wouldn't have been so difficult."

From force of habit Sir Philip knew enough to hold his tongue.

"Marvelous," he exclaimed, as pyramid after pyramid was now built by the lithe young bodies of the boys. "The human race will never degenerate physically with training like this."

The One Over One System.

RECREATION

Joan of Arc and Atalanta, hand in hand, floated through the cold, dark, slimy tunnel, up the steps, and into the hot, damp swimming pool in the girls' field house, where scores of maidens in grayish-white splashed hither and yon in the green chlorinated water.

"They do swim beautifully, don't they?" said Atalanta.

"Yes, but for heaven's sake! If they'd only dive daintily!" answered Joan. "Three times now I've thought the board was going to break."

"And look at their eyes," said Atalanta, dipping down over someone trying to swim across the pool with a lighted candle in one hand. "They're all bloodshot."

"And their lips are purple," said Joan. "I think we'd better leave this place."

"The sooner the better for me," answered Atalanta, and they oozed into the gym balcony. There Atalanta perched on the basketball blackboard, and Joan sat on the piano.

"They're tumbling or what have you," said Joan.

"It's a pretty rough sport," remarked Atalanta. "The way some of them land in those dives, you'd think they'd break their necks."

"Why don't you try one, then, dearie?" said Joan.

"I'm sorry, darling," said Atalanta, "but I've only a shade of a neck to break."

Just then James V of Scotland entered, unconsciously squeezing the penny he held in his hand into weird and fantastic shapes.

"We've been waiting for you," remonstrated Joan. "You were going to buy us a soda. If you haven't forgotten," she added slyly. "Where have you been?"

"Oh, I got side tracked," was the monarch's embarrassed reply. "You see, I overheard something about intramurals and it appealed to me."

"What did?" asked Atalanta, winking at Joan.

"I overheard a kid saying they were going to have free throws this afternoon," admitted the king guiltily.

ATALANTA

Atalanta Club was sponsoring a girls' race at its first spring meeting. Atalanta herself stood looking on eagerly with eyes alight. Jove, pompous and jolly in an Olympian toga, with his hair newly curled, rocked on his heels beside her. It was evident he was much taken with Atalanta and was seeking to create a good impression.

They listened intently as the judge announced the prize for the fastest runner.

"An apple, Jove, a real apple! It's truly wonderful, is it not? And all in honor of me! I simply must see it—I must! Come, let's sneak off now and take a peek at it."

"Wait a moment, my dear," and Jove restrained her gently as she leaped up lightly to search for the judge's stand. "The race is beginning—which do you think will win? That one in blue looks good to me—. She's won, by Juno! She's won!"

ATALANTA

Atalanta was plucking at his toga sleeve.

"Oh come now, before they award the prize—before they take the apple away. Hurry!" She sped swiftly and invisibly across the field, Jove stumbling at her heels. She reached the stand where the prize lay and stood a moment in silent admiration, as the giant redness of the apple flamed in the sunlight and rivaled even the color of her own cheek. Only a second she hesitated; then suddenly, snatching the treasure in her hand, she beckoned hastily to Jove, who had just arrived puffing and warm. Together they sped to the gate and disappeared from view.

As the judge turned to the bare table, a congratulatory smile still lingering on his face, the shades of Atalanta and Jove stole down the street, munching the apple and chuckling to themselves.

SONNETS

I

Now, in the last blue haze of setting day,
I turn my footsteps to the uphill road,
To leave alone the birches slim, that sway
Above the brooks, and pear-trees with their load
Of fragrant blooms. . . . The pastures, and the sod,
Clean-smelling where the plowman's share has turned . . .
The valley-houses, white and thatched, the broad
Brown road, the wayside thickets, freshly ferned . . .
There at my feet they rest, familiar things,
That I have known, and take away with me,
Though, in the swift succession of new springs,
This place may change, and I not here to see.
Yet in the dusk the uphill path is sweet—
So let my heart lend wings to eager feet.

II

What matter if it be as all men say:
That mountain-tops are lofty crags and lone,
Where beat the solitary winds, and day
Lights only barren soil and jagged stone,
And torrents crashing down the mountain-wall?
I have no fear of height nor endless space,
Nor clouds as somber as the fogs of fall,
Nor bitter winds that breathe into my face,
I have a faith to keep . . . And on that height
Soon shall I stand, amid the argent spheres
That float upon the rivers of the night;
Whose voices still the lonely prophet hears.
And this I know, the pinnacles will light
With something more than starshine . . . and more bright.

MARY ADAIR HARRISON.

THE STUDENTS' PROGRESS

*From the realm of childhood into that of the maturity to come:
Delivered in the similitude of the famous dream of John Bunyan, to whose dear old ghost I extend my most humble apologies.*

As I strolled through the wilderness of this world, I lighted on a certain place where was naught to disturb my slumbers, and I laid me down in that place to sleep; and as I slept, I dreamed a dream. I dreamed, and behold, I was marching along with a great company of children. There was a large wicket-gate of stone before us, beyond which I could see naught, but as I looked to the rear, in the direction from whence we had come, I could see the long, hot, dusty road of Elementary Education which meandered over the grassy meadows of Happy Childhood, and I could see, still farther off in the direction from which we had come, the deep vale of Infancy and Ignorance.

And in my dream I knew that we had trod that dusty road for eight long years, but few of us were footsore and weary, and most of us were eager to enter upon the new and strange domain which lay beyond the gate. And I put a question unto my neighbor—Whither go we? And he replied—Verily, the road ahead is as well known to you as it is to me!

Several of them remarked a curiously engraved shield carved in the arch of the gate; and on this shield was an acorn and three trees by a river, and across the shield were two words scriven in strange characters which none could understand.

And one said—I know one who has been through this gate and he has said that the import of the words above are, "All hope abandon, ye who enter here!" And there was much fear and doubt spread among many of the company.

But lo, in my dream we advanced through the stone portal, some timorously, others with happy confidence, and others with mere curiosity; and we had passed the first wicket-gate.

We could see but little of the road ahead of us, for our eyes were blinded by a great, brilliant light which intensified the darkness about us, as of one who first enters upon a darkened cinema theater.

There were those about us who were there to add words of counsel and advice, and there were those who had entered the portals before us who looked upon us with scorn and derision. But lo, we were wiser than our elders had thought us to be. We were soon able to see the path ahead with more clarity. Our confidence grew, for we had with us many competent and experienced guides to instruct us and some to assist those who might stumble on the road.

And a few were bewildered when they found that they were not taking the same path as their companions, for behold, the road had divided itself into several parts. But we could tread firmly forward for we knew that most of the roads were to converge again at that dazzling point called the Triumphal Arch of Graduation. But alas, some were beginning to walk upon roads that did not lead to the arch. A few, being wise, did perceive their mistake and did cross unto the right road before the crossing should become too arduous.

We advanced now with greater confidence and speed as the year grew on

(for in my dream, time did pass rapidly) and we did cross the first ridge. And we were rewarded and rested by our first milestone.

Then I heard in my dream the voices of my companions calling back as we beheld another company coming through the wicket-gate, and we looked upon them with disdain and derision.

Lo, said we—How small they are; how like bewildered sheep they come. Verily, we were never like that!

Now I saw in my dream that just as we had ended this talk, we drew near to a very miry slough that crossed our various roads; and we being heedless, did fall suddenly into the bog. The name of the slough was First Adolescence. It was at this point that it crossed most of the roads; but being irregular in shape, it was so that many had already fallen into it, and a few were yet to fall. But there was no road that did not pass through it.

And we floundered in it, hopelessly bemired; but lo, as we stepped deeper, we grew proportionately larger and stronger! As we struggled in the mire, we were often heedless of our own struggles, having begun to look about at the others. And each one looked with dismay at his own awkwardness and with envy at the seeming grace of everyone else. But we finally struggled to the other side of the slough. Many of us, having been lost in the mire, had come out upon a different road than that which we had first taken, but we stepped resolutely onward, glad to be free of the bog, although the mud still clung to us.

Then the boys began to look with favor unto the girls and the girls unto the boys. Methought in my dream, as I beheld the girls, that forsooth, only in the balmy climate of Oak Park and River Forest could such fine specimens of young womanhood be produced!

And the pathways again became a little easier, and we trod them leisurely; and verily, many of us did walk at such an easy pace that it became necessary for our guides to quicken our steps.

For then did we notice our new selves as well as the others, and we did take casual excursions from the Highways of Education. Many of the young men, noticing their newly strong bodies and capable arms and legs, did strike off from the road and did begin to scale that rugged hill called Athletics.

And beside the highways there were pleasant woodland paths; and many did cut off from the roads to congregate on these paths. As yet, there were only a few of these lanes, but we saw that there was a complicated labyrinth of them which lay ahead. There was a large grove where we could give vent to our romantic emotions (ah, did we then have emotions!) and the boys could exercise their newly-found bass voices in dramatic work. A few came together, feeling that their experience in passing through the Slough of First Adolescence was worth writing about; and lo! we had embryonic literary lights. And beside these paths there were others which led through the palaces of Worldly Pleasures (and never before had we ever been in such sumptuous palaces!). Many of us, alas, forgot the Highways of Education in following these paths; but we were wise, and we did return in time. For by these roads were the only passes through the obstacles which lay ahead.

And behold. We had passed the second milestone. And we had passed the half-way mark.

And some did then look back at the company behind us which was struggling awkwardly through the slough; and they looked upon them with deriding laughter. And they did say—Forsooth, how clumsy they are. We never could have been like that!

And now we were confronted with a real labyrinth wherein pathways and highways did weave among each other. And the hundreds of strange buildings and palaces through which they passed was like unto another Century of Progress Exposition. Then I knew in my dream that we had come unto Activity Fair.

To recount all of the wondrous things which I saw in my dream would be a task too great; suffice it to say that he who desired it could find pathways and palaces unto his liking. There were places wherein the young men or the young women could expound their theories on war, peace, politick, or what else of great import. It was marvelous in my dream, to think upon the facility with which they solved the great problems which weight the brains of the great sages of the Nation! There were places wherein bards or romancers could display their precious writings. Some did busy themselves in the publication of bulletins of the way and journals of the voyage. Some did stage comedies and tragedies for the entertainment and edification of all. And then there were leaders and councils to maintain the unity of the group.

Some, ever mindful of the Highways of Education, did establish fine records of progress; and it was marvelous to behold how many could make these fine records and still find time to make frequent excursions through Activity Fair.

And in this way, we passed our third milestone, and did commence the last stretch of our journey. Nay, we did not look back in disdain at the parties which were following us—For behold, we said—We have outgrown such juvenile manifestations of arrogant scorn. We shall not deride our poor inferiors!

And thus we looked upon them with a kindly, patriarchal, but haughty tolerance which is yet more exasperating than any outward display of disdain; but it was another step into that maturity for which we were striving.

Then, in all activities wherein we had entered did we assume the role of leaders; and though we had scattered everywhere over the labyrinth of Activity Fair, forsooth, never before had we been so conscious of the unity of our group. It was according to nature that we assumed the places left by our predecessors, but we did strive to outdo them. In many fields did we engage in more activities and win more honors than were expected of us.

Finally, after we had passed the crest of the last hill, did we see that triumphal arch of our hearts' desire, Graduation. But we did pass through that palace all too quickly, and lo, at the rear of the palace was another wicket-gate, more awesome than before. Beyond it stretched a great terrain of sweeping plains and rugged mountains. The roads ahead were much longer and more precipitous than could be imagined, but a rising sun did bathe the scene in a glory that did give us confidence for this new and much greater voyage on which we were to set forth.

Then I awoke; and behold, it was a dream.
